NEW QUESTION: 2

Under which two circumstances would an RSTP bridge flush its CAM table? (Choose two.)

- A. upon a port state change
- B. when transitioning from forwarding to discarding
- C. only when changing from listening to discarding
- D. when transitioning from discarding to forwarding
- E. when CAM resources have been completely used up
- F. upon receiving a topology change notification

Answer: D,F

Explanation:

Explanation First, the goal of RSTP is fast re-convergence. Since ports are assumed to transition to forwarding relatively fast, simply increasing MAC address aging speed is not enough. Thus, when a topology change is detected, RSTP instructs the bridge to flush all MAC address table entries. With Ethernet, this process results in unconstrained flooding until the moment MAC addresses are re-learned. The bridge detecting a topology change sets the TC (Topology Change) bit in all outgoing BPDUs and starts sending BPDUs with the TC bit set upstream through the root port as well. This marking lasts for $TC_{while} = 2 \times HelloTime$ seconds and allows the detecting bridge to start the flooding process.
